*Lady Rebecca does go on so, if I ever have to listen to her relating another of her Grand Tour anecdotes I profess I'll have no compunction whatsoever
in removing her from my ...
But I profess to being distracted,
there seems to be commotion in the Tower Garden, and I am well aware that this section of the grounds has been neglected these past few years and visitors at this hour are at the very least unexpected. The guests have all left and no servant has any business to be abroad this evening!*

*I do believe, but it can't possibly be ...
I must go, swiftly, urgently ...
I hardly dare draw breath, surely my eyes deceive me ...*

last journal entry, before she vanished)*

MYSTERY DISAPPEARANCE

After extensive investigations by Inspector Albert Fieldsman, Scotland Yard's finest detective, it is with regret I report that Lady Beth Randelson would appear, no matter how incongruous it may seem, to have disappeared completely without trace. Inspector Fieldsman stated that, "We could find no trace of her Ladyship, nor any evidence of underhand skulduggery or abduction. She was last seen running towards the Tower Garden on the Randelson Estate in her night attire by the scullery maid. From that moment to this, despite searching all waterways and hedgerows in the vicinity, no clues can be found nor a cadaver matching her description. It is almost as if her Ladyship has been spirited away ..."

Lord Randelson is reported to have taken up residence in Bath, having dismissed the staff and closed the estate. The fate of Lady Randelson and the reason for her disappearance may never be known, but her last journal entry does reveal some cause for further investigation, though it was dismissed out of hand by the police as being of little or no consequence and merely the ramblings of an intoxicated imagination.

The Tower Garden

The old walled Tower Garden is now completely wild, untouched by gardeners for many a year. A suggestion of an old path of clay cobbles leads the eye through heavy studded doors, past a stone stream bed to the right. In front is a statue embodying the spirit of nature and the magic that the garden creates. Further in, through a ruined arch covered in ivy, is the rear wall with three openings, each leads down a short passage to a view of another vista. These doorways are magical, transporting whoever wanders in the garden on a specific evening to enchanted realms. Is this where, perhaps, Lady Beth Randelson has disappeared to? Is this also where the nature spirits, now in the garden, have come from?

To the left is the folly tower, standing next to a pond. An old statue of a mermaid still rests in the pool, water cascading from her tail, as she sits forgotten by all except nature. The figures in the garden may appear as statues, but every now and then, when the veil between this world and the next becomes thin, so the portals to other realms open and the statues breathe life. It is a garden where magic is possible, a garden where you can really lose yourself.
